

CONTRIBUTING TO OCEAN MODELS

Modelling has become a fundamental scientific activity. The models are like digital laboratories, helping scientists understand and make forecasts. They work by simulating a physical phenomenon using laws, figures and mathematical formulae. To do this, scientists integrate data into computer programs. In oceanography, these data come from satellite observations and in situ measurements. There are models for a variety of applications, including weather and pollution forecasting.

